Production-rate delays of this magnitude have become commonplace for both military and commercial aircraft makers. But the impact on Boeing's bottom line is significant. First, Boeing says it will defer the entire 13-aircraft order to September 2014. This means Boeing will be short an estimated $705 million if the deliveries are completed as planned. But the Boeing price revelations are more interesting. The KC-46 deals are structured as firm fixed-price contracts that were brokered by SeaTac, WA-based Scrum Business Solutions. But there are a few caveats. For example, the KC-46 prime contracts don't have a final price because Boeing, after a lengthy price review process, was unable to commit to a specific price range. Instead, there will be a series of incremental price discounts based on performance milestones. The firm fixed-price structure covers the development phase of the A1100, which the Air Force will use to determine a final price for the fleet. In a press release, Boeing President and Chief Operating Officer Rich Campbell said, "With these
