NGS technologies increase the number of DNA targets that can be sequenced simultaneously. These targets usually cover a subset of the genome. A natural consequence is that the distribution of sequence polymorphism cannot be inferred on the basis of what is known for the reference genome. This constitutes a challenge for sequence-based population studies. We propose a pipeline (pipeline.py) for a unified data analysis of multiple populations. The pipeline is generic and is tailored for use with whole-genome sequences. It can be applied to different populations and can handle various NGS data. An optional module computes the likelihood of the data relative to the nucleotide diversity in the reference genome. This pipeline is also used to benchmark the quality of sequencing data. The pipeline can be run as a standalone Python script. It is available as a GitHub repository.
